3. Public Information Office: Slides, ca. 1970-1985

Collection Overview:

These slides were assembled by the Office of Public Information, North Carolina Division of Marine Fisheries in Morehead City, North Carolina, as a part of its governmental duties under the State Department of Environment, Health and Natural Resources. The images were transferred to the State Archives as inactive files, and were not regularly scheduled to be housed in our repository. The color slides date from the 1970s to the mid 1980s.

Collection Arrangement:

The collection of slides is arranged in seven three ring binder notebooks, and the original order under the parent agency has been maintained. They are generally organized by subjects; the topics include artificial reef, reef fish and natural habitat, the Dan Moore (ship), and law enforcement.

Biographical/Historical note

The Marine Fisheries Commission and the Marine Fisheries Division have their origins in agencies established during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. North Carolina's coastal fishing industry enjoyed a brief period of rapid growth following the Civil War; however towards the end of the century, commercial fishermen were experiencing a marked reduction in the catch rates for striped bass, shad, and oysters. As a first step toward the development of a conservation program, the 1877 General Assembly established a section devoted to fisheries within a State Board of Agriculture. Under the direction of a fish commissioner, the Fisheries Section initiated projects involving fish propagation and the cultivation of new oyster beds. In 1887 the General Assembly authorized the Board of Agriculture to elect three members to a Board of Shellfish Commissioners. By the decade of the 1890s, it was apparent that North Carolina's fisheries and oyster beds were continuing to decline. In response, different legislatures of that era enacted laws to more effectively conserve and manage the fishing industry. In 1891 jurisdiction over fisheries was transferred from the Board of Agriculture to the state geologist, and the Board of Shellfish Commissioners became defunct. In 1901 the General Assembly authorized the office of oyster commissioner, a gubernatorial appointee who would serve for two years. The oyster commissioner was charged with enforcing the state's oyster laws and supervising every branch of the oyster industry. In 1905 jurisdiction over fisheries passed from the state geologist to the newly established North Carolina Geological and Economic Survey. During the same year, Governor Robert B. Glenn called a convention at Morehead City to discuss problems facing the state's oyster and fishing industries. The convention advised that a single agency be established with sufficient authority to manage effectively and to enforce all laws and regulations pertaining to fisheries—a goal partially realized by the following legislature. The General Assembly of 1907 established the Fish Commission and directed it to report its activities to the Geological and Economic Survey Board. This commission was charged with enforcing all fish laws except those relating to shellfish. The Geological and Economic Survey, however, conducted numerous studies and meetings which addressed the state's shellfish resources.
